

Fans of TV Series 'Bomb Girls' Unite To Save The Show

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

TORONTO, April 27, 2013 — Fans of Global TV's Bomb Girls have gathered online from across Canada, the United States, and overseas in a bid to save their show from cancellation.

Bomb Girls, the award-winning period drama about female munitions workers in a Toronto factory during the Second World War, is filmed and set in Canada. Being aired on Global TV in Canada, Reelz Channel in the U.S., and ITV in the United Kingdom, Bomb Girls has gathered fans from every corner of the globe, and they are rallying together to try and save the show.

On April 22, prior to the end of the second season, Global announced that they would not be producing a third season of Bomb Girls; instead there are plans for a two-hour TV movie to tie up any leftover loose ends.

Though fans were disappointed by the news, they immediately mobilized: current campaigns include two petitions with a total of over 3,000 signatures; email and letter-writing campaigns; active Twitter hashtags; and an in-progress plan to send items related to the show to Global headquarters.

Why the campaigns? Fans want a change of heart and a much-deserved third season, or at the very least assurances that the TV movie will in fact make it to television screens. It is not only their passion that motivates these campaigns, but the knowledge that there are so many more important, historical, and women-centred stories to be told. These rich, layered characters deserve their chance to be heard.

Bomb Girls actors have expressed their regret at the cancellation of the show, and Rosie O'Donnell, who guest starred as a reporter in a season two episode, has said, "Bomb Girls is an amazing show about real women in Canada during WW2. It's quality television, moving and poignant, it deserves another season."
